From this blogger's perspective, the recent shooting of Dr. Tiller by a radical anti-choice activist is the most telling indicator yet that the 2012 election will be a hot debate about religious freedom, abortion and contraception. That assessment certainly isn't unique to me. I've written numerous posts over the years on the issue of religious freedom and abortion. I've also written numerous posts on the devastating effects that contraception has had on families, as well as the health and economic issues involved. The reasons for the shooting are less important to me than the fact that Dr. Tiller was gunned down while he was in his church, presumably praying. Tiller had a long history of providing abortions and sometimes (as recently as 2004) refusing to do them for religious reasons. Since then, Dr. Tiller's clinic has shut down. While his murder is devastating, his story provides a very good lesson for all of us: Don't mess with somebody's religion. That is precisely the problem for the anti-choice activists who want to use the state as their means to impose their religious views on other Americans. As for the killing of Dr. Tiller, it is an ugly reminder of the ugly lengths that extremists are willing to go to protect their religious beliefs. It is a reminder to all of us that while some rights are protected by the Constitution, many others do not. It is a reminder that while we can argue over what rights we have in our Constitution, we should never, ever forget that the number one purpose of government is to protect our rights. In my previous post, I had written the following about the constitutional issue at hand: There are other problems with the so-called Religious Freedom Restoration Act. First, there is no compelling state interest in imposing a law that allows religious people to discriminate against someone else. If a Muslim business owner who objected to being served pork or a Catholic hospital that objected to performing abortions because of a religious objection — those are compelling state interests, and federal courts have been willing to say so.

---
