Since the last week of January, Firefox has been getting consistently faster. It used to take me several seconds to open a new window. Even when I used to open a new tab in Firefox, it was still slow. This is no longer the case, and I can open a new tab or window in a fraction of a second. Here's a quick screenshot of the speed difference: I suspect that the reason for the speed improvement is that Firefox switched from an old JavaScript engine to SpiderMonkey, an up-to-date JavaScript engine. Here's a screenshot of how Firefox looks now: Notice the lack of an ugly orange toolbar. But the real reason why I like this is that it's just Firefox with a fresh interface. I also notice that it used to spend some time on the "allocate memory" step when loading the new window, but that's not happening anymore. This is a big deal. Firefox used to have a slow startup time. Now it doesn't. And it does look a lot better. A few days ago, I was looking for a way to synchronize my work computer (running Windows 7) with my main computer (running Windows 8.1). I tried doing that by using Dropbox and the Microsoft Remote Desktop client, but the connection kept dropping. So, I tried using Sync2Go and it turned out to be pretty good. Sync2Go synchronizes many of my files between my computers. It does so with a bare minimum of hassle. It's also a no-brainer for people who have two computers: you just put them in sync and you're done. Syncing files between Windows computers Syncing files between Windows and macOS computers I am using a ThinkPad T460 and occasionally
