But it returns me an empty array on each run. Why is that? var data = [10, 20]; var array: any = [...data]; var result = Array.from(array); result = undefined * result; console.log(result); A: You should do this: var data = [10, 20]; var array: any = [...data]; var result = Array.from(array); result[0] = result[0] * undefined; console.log(result); The problem is you are overwriting the same result array each time you do the assignment. When you do array = [...data], that data is just moved into the array, not created. As a result, when you access array[0], you get 10, not undefined. The [...data] creates a shallow copy of the object data, which contains the array data, and is assigned to a new array. When you mutate the array you create 3da54e8ca3
