Each year I'll pick one game from my shelf and review it. Here are the years in which I have started this each. (This year, my starting is in Septemebr and I'll follow until Spring.) The original reviewer of this game was "Borgo" and his review was 1/5. I'm not saying to erase the "borgo" reviews or that I agree with them or anything, but I'll only post those that received a score and a review. I'm more interested in reading about it from other review sites and myself. 2004: Alvin Cash This was the first "real" game I got for Christmas and for the next few months. It's a game that's centered on moving a large boulder from one spot to another spot...that's it. The movie was awesome though. After I beat the game, I thought that it was boring and quite unimpressive. Then the movie came out. Then I played the game again and it was fine. And so I guess that means that Alvin Cash is 4/5. The Good - Interesting - Interesting - Ingenious - Weird - For some reason, I don't think I'd hate this game but I have no real life wants to to see it. The Bad - No longer interesting? - At best 4/5. This was the first game I reviewed. A sequel came out years later. (Still haven't played it). "Hi. I'm Spock. Welcome to the Holodeck. A living computer on which you can live your dream or die trying. From the same minds who brought you the world of Star Trek, the Holodeck is an immersive 3D environment in which you can create whatever experience you desire. So why do you want to live in the Holodeck? I don't know, but there you go. Your choices are your own..." This is one of the first games to ever use the "town" concept (a la SimCity). So you must establish a town and create everything that is necessary to advance.

It's not a bad game and so I'm giving it 5/5.

"Captain, the Andromeda is on the brink of total destruction. We're standing by to beam you and the rest of the crew off in shuttlecraft G-9. It has a warp factor of 3.7. We just need to adjust your

” “By your leave, Lord Aquarian. You know where you are. Consider yourselves under a clean slate. Now, Merlin!” Announced by the voice of the Lord chancellor, each of the two prisoners was led by their guards through a door in the far wall and through another series of halls. They went from hall to hall until they came to a huge open space with huge curved stairs leading up and down, like open drainways. Their guards told them the stairs led to the dungeon, where the two former kings still languished, clinging to the walls of the Jail. They passed another guard who stopped their first escorts, allowing their guards to continue on before him. A postern door, the kind with things sliding backwards, opened off the huge room and as they walked by, another double set of guards came through pushing a cart, carrying their old furniture. They stopped just below the postern door. The guards lifted off the heavy brass hinges the wooden supports and pulled them out. One of them instructed the prisoners to be forthcoming. “I want my stuff put back where it was. Also, I’d like to have my armor, sword, and cloak cleaned of any dust.” “As you command, Lord Chancellor.” He leaned forward and dropped a considerable weight on the descending door, and it snapped shut with a bang. He turned and leaned back against the wall. “Listen carefully. The three of you are going to go up those stairs. If you go down any of them, we’ll know you’re going for help. So, we’re going to be very close by. Every door you come to has a single guard on it. One of us is always going to be behind it, expect none. When you get to your cell, we’re going to give you a couple of double strength guards. You will use all of their attention if you want. But, if you listen carefully, you may find I’ve told you the right thing. Now, move on. Be careful. If I haven’t told you the right thing, you’ll get yourself stuck in a position from which you can’t move.” Merlin blew, turning his staff into a storm cloud with a booming voice and a flash of red lightning. “Storm it is!” “Let’s go.
